

Benje M. Douglas is the project manager for the sexual assault across the lifespan technical assistance project at the National Sexual Violence Resource Center. In this position he leads the efforts of the agency to provide comprehensive training and support for law enforcement, prosecutors, health care personnel and advocates in how to provide trauma focused service delivery for sexual assault survivors. Benje has worked in the movement to end sexual and interpersonal violence in a host of voluntary and professional roles across the country including time as the director of prevention services at a large domestic violence response agency and as a community educator for a rape crisis center. He holds degrees from Truman State University, Brite Divinity School (TCU) and the Harvard University Graduate School of Education where he studied prevention science and practice. He currently resides in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania.